Slavery, Presbyterians, and Princeton

12:15 PM, Assembly Room, Jim Moorhead

Examine how Presbyterians addressed slavery in the pre-Civil War period. Contrary to what one might suppose, the institution was not confined solely to the South. Slavery still existed in New Jersey, though with dwindling numbers of people in bondage in the early 1800s. Explore Presbyterian responses to slavery here in Princeton--at the college, the seminary, First Church (predecessor of Nassau), and Witherspoon Street Church.

The world we live in today is one where faith is used mostly to stop progress and to keep the United States from changing. Our history, however, reflects a completely different story. This session will highlight several major incidents in the American political story where faith-driven activism expanded the circle of moral concern and moved us closer to realizing the Kingdom of God here on earth.
